Riksch BioFuels' Redesigned Web Site Improves Access to Biofuel Information

Crawfordsville, Iowa – January 14, 2009 – Responding to a need for more alternative fuel education, southeast Iowa biodiesel producer Riksch BioFuels has created a new Web site at rikschbiofuels.com.

The site, which includes basic definitions and advice for consumers interested in alternative fuels, was developed by Des Moines-based Web consulting firm Purple Wren.

In addition to information on where to find and how to use biodiesel, the site hosts the RB Blog, which allows users to subscribe for email delivery of national trend analysis and tips on putting biodiesel to work.

“Our goal is to make learning about alternative fuels as simple as possible for our customers and the general public,” said Don Miksch, Riksch BioFuels vice president and CFO. “We look forward to interacting with people on the blog and to sharing what we have learned so that this community of people passionate about the potential of biofuel can grow.”

About Riksch BioFuels, LLC

The founders of Riksch BioFuels have a deep agricultural background and a history of producing biodiesel. Recognizing the need for a biodiesel production facility in southeast Iowa, colleagues Neil Rich and Don Miksch formed Riksch BioFuels on April 4, 2005. The company produces and distributes several products, including RB100, RB99 and RB8000. For more information, visit rikschbiofuels.com.
